

HOW TO TALK ABOUT DOCTORS WITHOUT BORDERS

MALAWI 2015 © Luca Sola

Right now, our teams of more than 30,000 doctors, nurses, and logistical experts are providing lifesaving medical care in over 60 countries. How do we do it? Because of partners like you who share our mission and our message.

Here are some quick ways to describe our work to people who might be unfamiliar with Doctors Without Borders:

Short Description

Right now, Doctors Without Borders emergency medical teams—made up of over 30,000 doctors, nurses, and logistics experts—are treating patients in more than 60 countries. These teams save the lives of those threatened by violence, disease, malnutrition, exclusion from health care, and catastrophic events. They go where many other organizations can't or won't because that's where they're needed most.

And they can't do it without our support.

“ Doctors Without Borders is the difference between living and dying. We can look our donors in the eye and say your money is genuinely changing the lives of millions of people around the world. Thank you. ”

Longer Description

Right now, Doctors Without Borders emergency medical teams—made up of over 30,000 doctors, nurses, and logistical experts—are treating patients in some of the most remote and dangerous places in the world. In more than 60 countries, they're saving the lives of those threatened by violence, disease, malnutrition, exclusion from health care, and catastrophic events.

They go where conditions are the worst—where other organizations can't or won't—because that's where they're needed most. Doctors Without Borders also fights for their patients' rights to better care and access to affordable vaccines and drugs.

The organization is committed to providing care to everyone who needs it—regardless of gender, race, religion, or political affiliation. Most importantly: Doctors Without Borders-USA doesn't take government funding, which means they rely on supporters like us to respond to crises quickly and remain fiercely independent.
